Also, a need for electric power generation and heat source heating is being increasingly developed also in China, due to the growing use of electric automobiles and China's national goal of 7.5 million electric automobiles on the road by 2025. The electric automobiles and electric vehicles use electric power supplied by a battery provided in the electric vehicles, which is charged by a generator driven by a motor. Also, the heat source heating systems include a water heater using a heat pump, a hot-water storage tank, or the like. In recent years, due to the increased demand for electric power and heat, power generation and heat source heating equipments are increasingly consuming large amounts of electric power. In particular, in electric vehicles that are likely to be used in large quantities, such as electric automobiles and electric trains, there is a need to reduce electric power consumption to reduce the weight and cost of batteries. Also, there is a need for heat energy produced by electric power, which is substantially useless in the case of electric power used for commercial purposes. Thus, there is a growing need for heat recovery equipment to effectively utilize the heat energy. In the past, heat recovery equipment has been proposed, in which heat generated in a steam turbine for generating electric power, or generated in a water heater, or the like, is first collected, and then the heat collected is used to generate heat, thereby improving the electric power generation efficiency. However, all electric power and heat recovered in such conventional heat recovery equipment are wasted, and are not effectively utilized
